This week, in over one hundred cities and towns, thousands will launch a series of actions building towards the Shareholder Spring , delivering letters to the executives of the corporations in this country most responsible for undermining our democracy, crashing our economy, poisoning our environment and widening the gap between rich and poor.

By coming together around a joint strategy to confront corporate power , we could shape the 2012 electoral debates. The negative roles unregulated corporate power has on our economy and our elections would be front and center of the national conversation. In races nationwide candidates would have to decide which side they are on: Corporations, the structures of the 1%, or the rest of us.

Committing to such a broad-based effort to further expand the space opened by Occupy will create new possibilities for each of our campaigns. In isolation our campaigns on jobs and worker rights, revenue, banking, health care, immigrant justice, and the environment are not big enough. But together, we have the potential to shift the political landscape that all of us operate in.

We are in a moment that provides the rare opportunity to create this kind of shift. Moments like this don't come along often, so let's seize this one. Let's build a movement of the 99%!
